Endeavouring to always do something constructive for the environment has been the constant mission of Janki Devi Memorial College. This year, the lockdown did not affect the commitment of the college when it comes to its environmental initiatives.

The college's internal quality assurance cell and political science department organised an international webinar on, 'World Order and Non Traditional Security Challenges' on June 4, where four academic experts, Cleo Pascal from the United States, Ashutosh Mishra from Australia, Asanga Abeyagoonasekara from Sri Lanka and Uttam Kumar Sinha from India, deliberated on environmental security issues and how the world order is affected by these.

More than 300 people attended this webinar that made everyone reflect upon their individual and collective responsibility in creating a safe and healthy environment.

On World Environment Day, the college garden committee organised a sapling plantation in college where air purifying plants were planted by the staff, faculty members and Principal of the college, ensuring of course that all precautionary measures were taken while doing so. That aside, the students of Avani, the environment club of the college, along with others who are hostel residents as well as students of environment science, made environment videos, which they posted on social media, as well as posters that underlined the urgent need to deal with environmental issues.

The students also planted saplings in their residential area. Finally, on June 6, the college held its annual inter-college environmental debate competition, online, on the topic, 'Human suffering will worsen unless environmental exploitation ends'. The event saw enthusiastic participation from the colleges of Delhi University and students made very relevant presentations of their viewpoints.
